Frontier research for the Green Deal: Driving forward Europe's climate ambitions through innovation and transformation

With the European Green Deal, the European Commission aims for the EU to be completely carbon-neutral by 2050. This is an enormous ambition, and innovative frontier research supported by the European Research Council (ERC) will play a vital role in powering forward the cutting-edge research and technological development needed to achieve it. This CORDIS Results Pack highlights 15 ERC-funded projects that are playing their part in helping to achieve Europe's green and sustainable future.

erc Solar Energy Enabled for the World by High-resolution Imaging

Fact Sheet Results in Brief Results

Objective

THE GOAL
We will derive new and fundamental insight in the relation between nano-scale structure and the performance of 3rd generation solar cells, and determine how to apply this in large-scale processing.

THE CHALLENGES
We currently have a superficial understanding of the correlations between structure and performance of photoactive heterojunctions, based on studies of small-scale devices and model systems with characterization techniques that indirectly probe their internal structure. The real structures of optimized devices have never been "seen", and in devices manufactured by large-scale processing, almost nothing is known about the formation of structures and interfaces.

THE SCIENCE
We will take a ground-breaking new approach by combining imaging techniques where state of the art is moving in time spans on the order of months, with ultrafast scattering experiments and modelling. The techniques include high resolution X-ray phase contrast and X-ray dark-field tomography, in situ small and wide angle X-ray scattering, resonant scattering and imaging and time resolved studies of charge transport and transfer. To relate our findings to device performance, we will establish full 3D models of charge generation and transport in nano-structured solar cells.

THE FOCUS
Solution cast solar cells is the only technology that promises fast and cheap industrial scaling, and it is consequently the focus of our efforts. They require a tight control of processing conditions to ensure that the proper nano-structure is formed in the photoactive layers, with optimal contacts to charge transport layers and interfaces. The prime contenders are non-toxic polymer and kesterite solar cells.

THE IMPACT
Our results may advance 3rd generation, solution-cast solar cells to meet the "unification challenge" where high efficiency, stability and cheap processing combines in a single technology, scalable to the level of gigawatts per day, thus becoming a centrepiece in global energy supply.
